brian mclaren: an interview about what the hell he was thinking...

when writing the last word and the word after that, brian is also going to be at pomomusings and also tall skinny kiwi, among other places. it's sort of an extravaganza about hell across the blogosphere.

i think brian, like all real writers who read real books and don't lay around in their pajamas all day reading blogs, might discover a new found affection for bloggers and online discussion if he gets to stay in his pajamas for the next three days answering other bloggers questions. let's face it, folks, blogging, while the drug of choice for slackers like myself, is decadently time consuming. we cannot generate our own scandals, news and conspiracy theories without putting the hours in. this is why we love it, no? what would we do if we didn't have our blogs to distract us from all the other things we should be doing? can you imagine how much fun it would be if the godfather got the blogging bug? can you imagine how happy brian would be if he had a good excuse to work less not more??

so come on over tomorrow, don't be shy and post your comments, questions, concerns about hell, how brian feels about the cheesemakers and any other thing your heart desires. it's your one chance to ask your question and be guaranteed an answer. brian will be a good sport and if we have a really good showing, i'll try to post a nice dreamy picture of him from his hippie days. just to make us smile.
